this is the expected result of multiplying the 2.5-4.4% reduction in solar radiation observed during the last 30 years by the expected reduction of the sun's average brightness over the next 75 years. the article focuses on how through ten years of treatment, the percentage of cases that were found to be non-violent decreased from 50% to 3%, demonstrating a decreased number of criminals who were subject to the draconian sentencing structure. in contrast, the number of those who were found to be violent while in treatment increased from 3% to 48%, and the number who were found to be violent in prison prior to treatment increased from 4% to 12%. it is important to note that all of these values are over ten years, illustrating the time needed for the prison system to be able to rehabilitate these inmates. furthermore, in comparison to treatment for crack, in the past, an average of 97% of young adult cocaine abusers were placed in prison. researchers stress the importance of existing models of care and medications, because although they are efficient in terms of physical health, they are not effective at addressing mental health problems. in those with co-occurring mental health problems, drug abuse treatment was more effective than drug abuse treatment alone. with a history of abuse as a predictor of untreated mental health problems, it is imperative to include mental health assessments as a part of these evaluations. additionally, mental health treatment is more effective when combined with drug abuse treatment, but behavioral interventions are the most effective.

in 2010, obama signed into law the fair sentencing act, which reduced the 100:1 ratio for crack and cocaine and now penalties for offenders. among the provisions of the law is a requirement that sentencing guidelines for crack are now the same as for powder cocaine. while the law is not retroactive, early release for offenders with existing prison terms means the numbers could be more equitable in the future. those already in prison who have been sentenced under the old laws are also eligible. it is a good bill, it is good legislation, it is good progress, but the economy is not strong and the political climate is not helpful, said senator Leahy. we are trying to reduce incarceration, and we are in a very difficult place right now. the researchers generated the first models of the isee spacecrafts path through the dust layer in 1979. using these models, they found that the crack location was stable over the course of the 15-day isee mission. they determined that at least 23 days were spent in the region of the crack. as a result of the stability of the crack, the researchers conclude that the dust layer at neptune can be used as a scientific tool for understanding dust environments on planets and exoplanets. extending to more distant objects, the authors propose that follow-up studies and repeat observations are needed to determine what structures the dust layer may be present on other solar system objects. with further observations, it may become possible to determine if the dust layer is related to the kilometer-scale dust storms on titan, the moon of saturn.
