Ample Guitars are a much better choice than my use of SuperCollider, because SuperCollider lacks the kinds of guitar samples I want. On the other hand, you can use AGML as a standalone product with Roland SX 1 Gigas and later, a Co-op 3 patch, very easily. Ample Sounds AG13 includes an Audio Unit host application. This allows you to use the virtual instruments, as part of your application. This could also have been implemented in the VSTi, but it would have been much harder to do. This allows the user to use the virtual instrument inside their DAW of choice, so that the virtual instrument and host can both get the most out of the engine. WAV samples are represented by WAV files with a.WAV extension and 2 or more WAV files with a.WAV.AXX extension. The.WAV.AXX extension is replaced by the.WAV extension in the host when you use the virtual instrument. If you need to change the instrument's filename, you can do so. The only complaint I have with this patch is the lack of display of which arpeggios the samples are actually playing. In the gui version of the AG13 VSTi, arpeggios are represented by different colors, and it is pretty clear what is playing. With the WAV patch, it is not so easy to see which arpeggio is supposed to be playing, and the user would have to look at the filename to check. If you like SuperCollider, you may like Ample Guitar. The engine is fairly straight forward, and is often a better solution if you want a more detailed sound than SuperCollider can give you. Most of the complexity of the engine is in the samples and sample loading, so simple users could still get a lot out of the product.
