I recently did a review of Adobe Photoshop for my blog. The review was largely positive. I'm sure that Adobe really appreciates some good blog reviews as it is often up against Adobe Elements and Apple Aperture2 and just doesn't seem to get the same credit. I applaud performing this honest review and hope it helps other people decide whether or not they should consider making the switch to Adobe Photoshop.- Ring Chen I had to leave the PC version of Photoshop behind a long time ago. At a time when internet connections were slow and networks were often non-deterministic, downloading a system-critical app was usually a no-go. And wasn't it always a pain to go to Adobe for help or troubleshooting if something went wrong? The new "shadow/highlight" tool in Adobe Photoshop CC is really something to see it. It's easy enough to understand and use (in my testing), yet offers some powerful new editing tools in the form of a series of bezier handles which appear at the click of a button. To activate the new effect, simply click the "Shadow" button in the top panel and you'll see a set of curved handles which will be activated; follow this set of handles with your mouse to get the desired effect. And of course, your changes are mirrored in your main editing window, so you'll be able to review and make adjustments while still in the "shadow" mode. With the new "Shadow/Highlight" tool in Photoshop CC, it's easy to create and tweak a new "Pop" effect. Simply click the menu button at the top of the editing window, click "Shadow/Highlight" and use the handles to quickly create a range of bezier handles.
