The goal of the proposed research is to identify and determine the genetic and biochemical mechanisms involved in the maintenance of normal plasma and red cell potassium and sodium concentrations in man. The experiments will be performed using radioactive tracers, primarily tritiated potassium and cations such as rubidium and thallium. In addition, a number of nonradioactive tracers, primarily tritiated furosemide, will be used to measure intracellular potassium and sodium concentrations in a variety of tissues, particularly erythrocytes. The following categories of experiments will be performed: 1. Metabolism of potassium and sodium: both tracer and non-tracer techniques will be used to determine the metabolic turnover of potassium and sodium in cells, tissues, and blood. 2. Translocation of potassium and sodium across cell membranes: the rate of potassium and sodium movement through the membranes of erythrocytes and other cells will be assessed by both tracer and non-tracer techniques. 3. Interrelationships between blood potassium and sodium concentrations and the activities of different metabolic, transport, and regulatory processes: radioactive tracer techniques will be used to determine the rates of transport of potassium and sodium into and out of erythrocytes in order to assess the importance of these rates in the maintenance of normal concentrations of these ions in the blood. Various conditions which alter the interrelationships between these various processes will be evaluated. 4. Effects of pregnancy and certain drugs on blood potassium and sodium concentrations: the effects of pregnancy and a number of drugs on blood ion concentrations will be evaluated using radioactive tracers and non-radioactive methods. The proposed studies will hopefully provide a better understanding of the metabolic and regulatory mechanisms involved in potassium and sodium metabolism and help to explain the etiology of conditions such as muscular weakness and cardiac arrhythmias.

1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a multilayered optoelectronic circuit and a process for producing the same, particularly to a multilayered optoelectronic circuit with a simplified structure and a process for producing the same. 2. Description of the Prior Art The demands on the development of optoelectronic devices as information devices have increased year by year, along with the progress of the current computer technology. The photovoltaic and light emitting diode (LED) have been popularly applied to the portable instrument and integrated circuit for the emitting of various lighting, like a bar-code reader, a mobile phone and a digital camera. The optoelectronic device has advantage such as high conversion
