Another interesting feature of Photoshop CS6 is the introduction of a feature called “Section Masks.” This feature allows you to automate your selection process. This means that you can make multiple selections in a single step without having to select each one of them. The feature looks like the two yellow circles here. You can select an area by simply using one or more of the circles. Now, the feature is really clever when it comes to correcting your perfect selection, because when you select an area that is slightly off from the original selection, Photoshop automatically changes the thumbnails and the histogram view to reflect that. This way you immediately know which areas are out of the selection. You’d certainly know what I’m talking about if you’ve ever been in a situation where you’ve selected areas over an image and accidentally touched another, previously unselected area. You can see in the below screenshot that the thumbnail and histogram now indicates only the area that was originally selected. Photoshop CS6 allows you to do all that without leaving the program. Another new feature in Adobe Photoshop CS6 is the ability to create compound masks. Compound masks are a real time saver. It allows you to create a control shape or path and then use the “stroke area” tool to create a shape or path around it, quickly creating a mask. You then have the option to fill or outline the shape using the selection or any other path inside it. For example, a shape like this was created in a few minutes.
