When lightroom is in the foreground, it's at the bottom of your screen with a folder of images open in the right of your file browser. You can navigate your images through your open folders or by clicking the name of the file. If it's you who's in the foreground and is the one doing the editing, it's simple to go from image to image and make changes (via the keyboard, a modifier or other means). What this will do is load the original image into your image editor, regardless of where it may be on your hard drive. It does this by hiding your Lightroom classic view and the folder and image browser is at the bottom of your screen. You get back to your desktop easily and can find your original image in any number of places, including as a sidecar. For example: In this shot, I was working on a new picture of our dog, Fidgit (our bishop). I was in my image editor on a specific folder of images and in the process of cleaning a spot out of this photograph. While there, I added an adjustment layer to make him more perky. Once I was done, I moved to my desktop and clicked on the top layer (the top of Fidgit). I had a new blank canvas; I couldn't find my dog. His picture got hidden in the folder of images with most other photos. Now I have an image open on the desktop, and with a few clicks I could find my dog and load that image into my image editor for further editing. If you are in the editor, select the top layer and the file icon will appear at the top of your screen. In the dialogue box, turn off "lock item." This will cause your image to remain on the desktop. You can put the "lock item" back on, or you can select "Lock layer items" if you want to hide the whole image at once.
