When I think of growing up in the suburbs, I think of mid-century design, parents who support their kids' passions, a general ease of access to food and fun, and more time to sleep. In fact, growing up in the suburbs also meant having less money and living in a much more remote area. And as a young, upper-middle class adult in Chicago, I can say that those memories ring true. One of the first houses I lived in was a split-level on the north side, and it was probably the most architecturally designed house I'd ever lived in. (To be fair, there were large grassy spaces in the front and back of the house, but no real front door and no interior walls in the back.) I didn't have my first garden until I was about 12. In some ways, my suburban childhood was more of a backpacking experience, as I had the freedom to explore the city and farmlands in our area. But it was an experience I remember clearly because my parents wanted me to have it, and they were the first to let me get a driver's license and a car. To me, suburban childhood was the perfect combination of a strong upbringing with freedoms to be childish. But I'm starting to think that I may have missed something. A few years ago, I read a story that had the effect of waking me up to the fact that I was not completely "naturally" suburban. In "Eating Like a Civilized Person in America," Michael Pollan writes about his trip to Vienna, where he eats a traditional three-course meal at the home of an upper-middle-class Austrian family. While his dinner may be a once-in-a-lifetime experience, Pollan had an opportunity to watch what his parents ate, and what his kids ate, and what his neighbors ate, as a regular part of his life. On the one hand, he saw how "decent food was a luxury for the middle class" in America. On the other hand, he noticed how his dinner experiences were influenced by how much money he had. During the dinner, he sat at the table with his family and noticed that "how we ate could
