In Lib. mode, it can take a while for the program to dump previews for a large number of images. The previews save a lot of time, but they can cause trouble. A large number of JPEG previews slows down display, as does previewing all the Jpegs that are part of a large Photoshop catalog. So I usually preview only the highlights on a catalog to work. I use Photoshop for many things, including covering event photography and fashion. Control the editing process from an off-camera body and a laptop, and access and share files from an iPad or smartphone. I can touch up images onsite, make quick adjustments, and submit without risk of losing edits. I can open a large number of images and process only the ones I want to edit, then lock the rest. Coming to the new version is that they have been adding some features that are really better suited in new versions of other Adobe apps, like InDesign (InRev). InDesign is used for posters, ebooks, magazine pages, a lot of brochures, and more. InRev is an interactivity application that works like when you're playing a Flash movie. The idea here is that you can stop a PDF, open it up in InDesign, then either place a link (clickable element) or export that object as its own vector file. Opening PDFs in InDesign becomes a lot easier; all you have to do is open by double-clicking. It's awesome for print work. However, Adobe has not yet created an InDesign plug-in for the A6 size, which is especially useful for creating high-res wallets and concert programs.
