The so-called “fake news” phenomenon has seized on a new battleground—the world of politics. Many believe that fake news is a tactic used by the left in an attempt to control the message. But the truth is that media outlets on both sides of the aisle use the tactic and propaganda outlets (sometimes backed by foreign governments) spread it as well. Here is a guide on how fake news—and who is spreading it—on both sides of the aisle.

What Is Fake News? Fake news is any news article that is deliberately designed to mislead the reader, which may be confusing, false, or even conspiratorial. Fake news can make the news cycle go viral and appear on the front page of a major news outlet, getting hundreds of thousands of views and making headlines. The spread of fake news can be attributed to several factors. As more sources of news become more readily available and people have more access to the internet, there is an increased amount of news flowing in on social media and the internet. When news is more accessible, there is a greater chance for people to believe it and it may be easier for them to believe it is correct because it has been published by a major news outlet. In 2017, there were more outlets that published fake news than real news, according to The Washington Post. Fake news is also increasing due to the rise of conspiracy theories and this trend has only been growing in popularity. Many believe the news they hear and read from the internet is the only way to stay informed, and news organizations must make it easier for them to trust their news. This is why conspiracy theories are so dangerous—they can spread very quickly because people who are being told something is true are more likely to believe it.

How Is Fake News Spread? The fact that fake news can spread so quickly is the result of many different factors, including how each news outlet reports and publishes, the number of people being exposed to it, the incentives in the news industry, and the incentives of each outlet. Fake news
