I currently have a 3rd party library that expects me to provide it with a pool of threads. Some threads are specifically for reading from a socket while others wait for a specific message from a socket. These worker threads are supposed to interact with the library in a thread safe manner (specifically, how to deal with the same socket being used). Currently, I have no idea how I should go about implementing this. I could allocate a new thread for every socket, but this seems inefficient. I tried using a CriticalSection, but this didn't seem to work correctly. Should I use a Semaphore? I could have a basic counter for how many connections I have open and then use a Semaphore to limit the number of threads I have. But I don't really know if this is actually a good way of doing this. A: That's right. In some cases one thread per file descriptor is the most appropriate design, though if your data volume is small and you're not loading data quickly, performance may not be critical. All of the answers so far suggest it,
