After reading this article about Patent Registration, you may be thinking of filing your own patent. Patents are expensive to file, as you know, but if you wish to file, you should at least make sure in advance that there are no other patents in existence. If there is, you will need to obtain a license before filing your own patent. There are three types of patents: Utility, Design and Plant. A utility patent protects the invention by being used for a specific purpose, such as using an electrical appliance for cooking food or running a machine. Design patents protect the appearance of the design of something. They are not necessary if the appearance is the only element of the invention, but they can be useful if you are submitting a design that has both an appearance and function. Plant patents are the most common, and they protect the cultivation, propagation, and growth of plants. They are usually granted if you first file a utility patent and then file an action on your plant patent within 6 months. If you file your patent before filing your plant patent, your plant patent will be considered abandoned.

For instance, you can brighten images, reduce noise, sharpen or blur images, and straighten or rotate images. What It Does: When you use the Levels feature, you can make minor color adjustments to bring out or diminish colors as well as enhance the appearance of your image's shadows. What It Does: The Blur Gallery feature gives you instant access to five ways to blur your image, including Gaussian Blur, Motion Blur, Lens Blur, Pin Light, and Vignette.
