If you have been working on a set of photographs, then you probably need to do some tuning of the colors of the various color profiles. As you do this, you can manage these changes in the Convert Colors– and under the Snap to Color– adjustment layer commands. In addition, you can also remove the color profile changes with the Remove Color Profile – Adjustment Layer command. The latter command doesn't work for Photo Blocks, but instead allows you to duplicate the new adjustment layer, and then you can hide the original color profile adjustment layer. To do this, you can either click the adjustment layer icon and simply remove a color profile you don't want, or as I suggested above, duplicate the layer and hide the duplicate. If you want to create new adjustments or edit the values of existing adjustments, you can create new adjustment layers. These are created in Photoshop's palettes, which are organized in a Spiral or Wave like pattern. You can then name the adjustment layer and add the appropriate controls to hold your specific adjustment parameters. Also, you can insert a clipping mask, set a brightness/contrast or multiply or set opacity on a layer. Adobe Express CC provides tutorials on all levels of art, from beginners to professionals. The features available in Photoshop extend to Artboards, Pretouch Brushes, and filters in just a few clicks. Photoshop Live Mask Warp is the slickest, until you get a new image you want to use, when it doesn't change the original photo. The lower values go to zero, and the higher never get positive, but there's no setting to 'inflate' or 'deflate' the masked regions so you have to rely on things like desaturating and clipping to make things fit. It's not as if the highest value is the one you want, and often ends up with an over-amplified look rather than a more realistic one.
