I like this update to Lightroom 4. I've been using it for a couple of weeks now, and I really like it. It keeps the interface simple and clean, and the camera matching tool is a great way to just get the crop right in the first place. It took me a little bit to get used to how it works, but it's very fast and responsive, too. I didn't mind having the different color profiles in last year's program, but they seem to be a bit clunky in this version. Images that are being converted to other formats, like raw and jpeg, show their colors clearly and easily. I understand that some of these improvements are based on feedback, so I'm happy to give it a try, and glad to see them on the newest version of Lightroom. The most interesting change here is that raw files can now be sorted by date used. Yes, it's been an option before, but now you actually can sort them by date, which is nice. I don't know why this wasn't enabled on earlier releases. It might be a bug, or it just wasn't possible to implement. Whatever the case, it isn't as critical as it used to be. Bulk operations like collections and labels as well as the "Adjust Redeye and Eye Separator" and "Adjust Save for web" features are really powerful in terms of automation, and have been updated to match the new files processing options. The other major improvement is exporting files: you can add a date/time stamp to folders like thumbnails, albums and tagged images. That way you know the shot was taken at a certain time of day or age. It's a nice touch and something I hope remains in every version going forward. Speaking about metadata export, Adobe has also updated the settings for "Blur Background" and "Sharpen Focus." The latter was a bit weird to begin with, so this is a welcome improvement, and I like the option to add a different amount of sharpening to the highlights and shadows, instead of only having it sharp, or having zero sharpening. Finally, they also made the "auto" selection of "Product Type" and "Underlying Storage Format" updateable. Before, that was always fixed; now it's completely customizable. These are all welcome improvements that should give more power to the user. Hopefully we get the same updates to Lightroom 5 with further point releases, as they are both equally necessary, and effectively do the same thing, so they should get equal attention.
