There's always room for improvement, and Adobe has integrated a number of useful features since the last update. The Tilt-to-Zoom lets you take a two-finger pan around your image after you've locked the camera. This is really useful since you wouldn't want to have a perfectly composed image except for the fact you can't zoom out from your iPhone. The Versions palette is organized by date, but I'd still prefer a search-by-time or by-folder feature. Adobe even added a "back" command that restores the document you're working on to the prior state. There's also a crop tool in the toolbar that works with the viewfinder. The can crop. I'm a huge fan of Apple's Aperture as an all-in-one photo system, complete with flexible media management, collaborative editing, and incredible workflow features. It's a great tool for very large multifaceted projects. Adobe is trying to emulate all of that with Lightroom in the cloud. While Lightroom looks a lot like Aperture, it's mostly about organizing your images and telling it where to put them. (That's the task of the database, which I can't live without.) The editing experience feels more like the traditional Photoshop workflow of layers and filters, which makes for good in-the-moment work, but I'm not feeling like I'm working in Aperture or Lightroom as much as I am in Photoshop. It would take a large budget and a lot of time to port a large Aperture library to Lightroom. And, I truly like the fact that Lightroom is 64-bit-only.
