Numerous precautions need to be taken in the processing and packaging of blood products to prevent contamination and to extend the shelf life of the blood. The following steps should be taken to prevent contamination and extend the shelf life of the product. 1. All processing steps should be performed in sterile operating rooms. 2. Necessary consumables and materials, including but not limited to, sterile needles, bottles, tubes, scalpels, connectors, vacuum pumps, containers, and utensils, should be sterilized or be equipped with sterile enclosures or systems. 3. Blood products should be processed and stored under strict aseptic conditions. Equipment should be cleaned carefully, before the next processing. Connectors and tubes should be sterilized between uses to prevent microbial contamination. 4. Vacuum pumps and hoses should be removed after processing, and sealed in a separate, dedicated container until the next use. 5. Wound drainage units and heat packs may be impregnated with anti-microbial agents to decrease their microbial contamination. 6. Store blood products in an upright position to prevent microbial contamination. 7. Vials must be filled in a different procedure to prolong the storage period.
