Preliminary dose distributions for electron beams produced by a 52 MeV electron beam using a BiEXT accelerator have been investigated. The results show a good agreement between the quasi-monoenergetic spectra and the spherical dose distribution, which indicates a reasonable use of the self-absorption effect. The study also shows a potential of using the BiEXT produced electron beam in a proton therapy, where the resultant proton dose distribution is expected to be similar to the electron dose distribution if a sufficiently large number of BiEXT electrons are delivered to the tumor.Q: How can I modify a function in python with a for loop? I would like to iterate over a list of variables and then assign them to a function. I would like to do something like this: def func(x, y, z,...): return a, b, c for (x, y, z) in (1, 2, 3): func(x, y, z) That does not work. Are there any alternatives? A: I'd do that a little differently. def func(x, y, z,...): return a, b, c for a, b, c in zip(1, 2, 3): func(*(1, 2, 3)) I use * because... honestly, you're not going to pass it arguments anyway. This assumes you want the output as (1, 2, 3). If you want something like your original, I'd just do a dict. def func(x, y, z,...): return {"a": a, "b": b, "c": c} And then just do for x, y,
