Narayen said the company has experimented with "sense--or neural-capital-independent--technology-that not only scans images of others [shareholders] but can also scan their eyes and pupils. If something is wrong with a product, you want to know it quickly." Narayen was the head of Microsoft's Internet division before he joined the company as CEO. He said that the second Nature's Eye replaced the first senses--such as vision or hearing--like a second-generation camera, it would be next to impossible to fool it. Adobe has a long track record of churning out powerful software. Just as important, the company isn't afraid to admit when it makes mistakes. We've written about the speed issue before, and Adobe has changed just about everything about it. Two years ago, Adobe changed the way people load their photos from a DVD drive to a thumb drive. Additionally, the company has greatly improved the speed of Photoshop. With the new application, you can open five pounds of image files every second instead of eight.
