In conclusion, I've still got a soft spot for Photoshop. It's the best, and only photo-editing app I have on my iPad Pro. I don't begrudge Apple for adding that feature, but making it exclusive to the iPad Pro is not something I want to see them do. I'd much rather see Photoshop moved to iOS 10. If Apple had done that, I might have upgraded to the iPad Pro. Software updates, like websites, are more successful the less you do them. Users who've been bothered by the lack of features in Photoshop CC 2017 would be better off waiting for the release of 2017.1. In fact, just a few days ago, Photoshop CC 2017 was updated to 2017.2. By all accounts, Adobe Photoshop CC 2017.1 is not as significant an update as the 2017.2 update. Disclaimer - I'm not an Adobe employee. The 2017.2 update includes the newly unveiled Content-Aware Fill tool, which makes it possible to spot slight flaws in an image and "fix" them. This can be a big benefit, especially for those who have difficulty in recognizing what they're working with. What's more, the cloud-enabled functions and the ability to open files saved in the cloud under Photoshop CC are nice additions. By contrast, 2017.1 adds a feature known as Content-Aware Move to help users move objects in an image, as well as an array of minor interface enhancements and bug fixes. The only addition I was really hoping for with the 2017.1 update was the ability to add a photo to an old JPEG file saved in the cloud. The 2015 update of Adobe Photoshop CC 2015 saw a lot of changes. With the 2017 updates, the features are much more impressive than they were in 2015. If you haven't yet upgraded to the 2017 version, it's time to do so, unless you're desperately in need of new features. No matter what the updates are worth, paying for a new version of Photoshop doesn't seem like a bad move. This is especially true if you're using the app on your iPad.
