I am willing to purchase Lightroom many times over, but for the price I paid, I do believe that Adobe's other programs are not well-priced. Lightroom 4.3 is still only the cost of a nice coffee. I do have some issues with the latest update to Lightroom, but since it is a bug-free program, I can't really demand free updates just for the sake of it. I only find this to be a problem because it is a whole new development team. I understand that it is appealing for them to take on new challenges, but once they understand it better, I am sure that they will embrace it. On a related note, it's good to know that Lightroom 5.0 is already in development, so we should see more fixes in a near future. However, it is difficult to tell whether the new features will be related to the cloud or not. Hopefully, Adobe will deliver. New features are aplenty in this version, and there's something here for almost every Photoshop user, while the performance is better than ever. The development team at Adobe is adapting to changing trends in its final, premium software, and it's clear that the team is listening to what's important to users and what's not. Lightroom 5 is easy to operate and easy to use. There are very few new elements in the interface that you need to learn; everything has been reworked to be more intuitive and to work more efficiently. Admittedly, one oddity of the "all new" UI is the lack of scroll bars on the side of the image window. You can scroll vertically or horizontally, but horizontally will leave white space. There are simply no scroll bars with the mouse, there's no key. In fact, scrolling is achieved entirely with the arrow keys or zoom buttons on the scroll wheels.
