I think Adobe's decision to make Lightroom for mobile (iOS and Android) is one of the best decisions they have made in the history of the program. Of course, regardless of what your preferred OS is, you're always going to want to see your photos on your monitor, but the convenience of being able to work from anywhere—all while taking your photos with you—actually makes this a viable option. This will have a direct impact on the market. In fact, I have no doubt that the price of Lightroom (especially for a modest hobbyist) is going to drop soon because you're not going to need anything more than the hardware and software to get started. So while this update is still unfinished, I felt that I had to get out something about it after taking some time away. I would be the last one to discourage anyone who is interested in the software from buying the new version (it is only $79.99) but remember that this is an early beta. I did not get to use the program extensively, but I was able to get approximately 30 images into the database that should have been included in Lightroom 4 with absolutely no problems. I have already used the Library from a Desktop app, and the new view is extremely useful. I think it is helpful having a lower resolution preview with each image. It is nice to see the Original resolution and preview is included as an Original option in Library view. The second important thing I noticed when creating a New RAW image is that it is stored as a RAW file, plus the embedded Collections are retained. I think the selection of the Collections may become confusing to some, but I think it makes sense. Photos have a lot of different collections, and I think that you are going to have a similar collection for every shot you take. Your pictures and your future pictures may require a different set of collections. Fortunately, I think the process is easy to select the information right from the Application. What makes the application a bit confusing when starting new is that the names are different. I found that the titles in the metadata are the same for every single RAW file stored. This is confusing because I literally had to open a few images to make sure that the metadata sections were rendered properly. For example, the three images shown here are all from the same shoot using a Nikon D90. The Black Coat, Silver Coat and Flame Coat metadata sections are the same for all three. One of the original problems with this was that none of these images fit into the category of Black Coat, Silver Coat or Flame Coat. With this update, the metadata is all rendered properly. The only thing that is missing is the Selection option that was available in the previous versions.

In addition to the wording found in my title, thankfully, very few references to 3D were made in this post, and if they did, for a moment, I wish I could have put them into context. In any event, here is a reference to Zack Blanks' mixed reality hologram, which (as I note above) makes a great bridge between 3D and modern real-time graphics. Again, this was not done for application of the 3D or subversive 3D. The approach I took was to notice the similarities of what I felt were pretty significant, only-in-the-title similarities, because the rest was very different. I think Zack Blanks' dream, a hologram that looks like a real-time haptic audio-animated real-time soundscape, is a great step in mixed reality, and I could see a DXR 3D experience utilized in this in a very powerful way. Regarding the rest of this post, artists creating real-time 3D images and animations, not awesome in the slightest, need to get their puny pal sub-10K 3D engines ready for the real-time applications, if they want to have any chance of what good tools and support they're used to in the 21st Century.
